Batt Humphreys

Batt Humphreys, a Georgia native, began a career in television news in Charleston in the early 80s. His career took him to CBS News in New York where he spent 15 years, most as a senior producer, before leaving to return to his beloved South. He managed the coverage of many of the events that have shaped our lives over the past quarter century, including the first hours of the morning of September 11, 2001, several wars, elections and as a reporter covering hurricanes, executions and more murders than he cares to remember.

Humphreys and his wife Laura currently live on a farm outside Charleston, along with horses, dogs and cats of varying populations.

Dead Weight, his first novel, is based on a true story. Humphreys has petitioned the governor to pardon Duncan: "The pardon is a chance to correct an injustice and to restore honor, even if it never connects to his immediate family. For those who believe in the continuity of souls, somewhere he will know and somehow we will have helped restore what was taken from him."
